

The South Orange Gaslight

Where the arts lead ...

the money will follow

What's the newest tool for improving community economics? These days, the national trend is using the arts to spark growth in downtowns.

One thriving example is right in our midst, where The Village (through The Baird), Seton Hall University Arts Council, the South Orange Performing Arts Center and the Essex County Division of Cultural and Historical Affairs have partnered to become combined recipients of an "Arts in Communities" grant from the New Jersey State Council on the Arts.

The $10,000 grant is helping the three venues create a system to promote and raise public awareness of wide-ranging arts in our own community. The message will target the Village and nearby communities.

"Between The Baird, Seton Hall and SOPAC, Villagers should never have to leave their own town for entertainment or cultural exposure," said Judy Wukitsch, co-director of the South Orange Department of Recreation and Cultural Affairs.

"By working together, we can make a case for a healthier future for South Orange in many areas."

As demonstrated in other communities, cultural plans address quality of life, civic pride and a community's unique sense of place. Promotion of cultural diversity can also help breed tolerance.

Seton Hall was the lead organization in applying for the grant, and the groups' first combined action was a community panel discussion involving residents and business owners on Feb. 28. The meeting produced these goals:

- Hold three to four town hall meetings with various stakeholders.
- Implement a community and patron survey, and an economic impact study.
- Hire a professional consultant to write a strategic plan.
- Create a fundraising program to move forward.

"While the short-term goal is to develop a community cultural arts plan," said Seton Hall spokeswoman Miriam Lyons-Frolow, "the ultimate goal is to form an arts council to serve as an umbrella organization for collaboration, coordination, support, resources and marketing."

"We're a small town with three significant entities that already have their own names and programming," said Wukitsch. Together, "the layering is beautiful." ▲

Q&A on property revaluations

Now underway in South Orange

Revaluations of South Orange properties began in February and will continue through October. To ensure open communication during the process, the South Orange Revaluation Committee has been formed as a collaboration between residents and local government. Below are questions and answers generated at the committee's first meeting on Feb. 7. As more information is available, details will be posted at southorange.org.

Why is the Village revaluating South Orange properties?

The Essex County Board of Taxation and the state of New Jersey mandate periodic revaluation of municipal properties. In South Orange, the last revaluation was in 1991. The process ensures that the local tax burden is fairly and equally distributed among all property owners. It also ensures that all properties are assessed at 100% of their true market value. In South Orange, most properties are assessed at approximately 38% of their true market value.

How are values determined?

Generally, by analyzing the sales of properties and current listings in a particular neighborhood. Also, land sales figures are collected, verified, and analyzed by zone. The seven-step process is as follows:

- 1) All properties (residential, commercial, and industrial) are inspected.
- 2) Data is analyzed and evaluated.
- 3) Each property is given an assessed value.
- 4) The general public is informed of updated assessments.
- 5) Residents may schedule meetings to discuss specific concerns about individual properties and assessments.
- 6) New figures will be submitted to Essex County in January 2008.
- 7) South Orange will respond to any questions brought by the Essex County Board of Taxation.

Who is appraising the properties?

Field inspectors from Appraisal Systems, Inc. (ASINJ.com) are conducting 15-minute door-to-door inspections between 9:30 a.m. and 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. Each inspector has been background-checked and must wear a photo ID.

How will I know when my property is to be inspected?

Advance letters will be sent to residents. If no one is home, the inspector will leave a card indicating a return time and date. If the new date is inconvenient, the homeowner must call the provided telephone number to reschedule. Appointments may not be made in advance.

What if field inspectors are denied entry?

The property will be appraised on the spot at the highest reasonable value and left on a blue card for the owner to review. If the owner disagrees, he/she can reschedule a more accurate inspection.

What do inspectors look for?

When examining an interior, the inspector looks for specifics that could affect property value, such as wall construction, number of bathrooms, type of heat, air conditioning other than wall units, percentage of finished basement, half-story or attic area.

Exterior inspection covers the size, story height, roof structure, type of foundation, and outside walls of the main building and any other structure on the property, such as a garage or storage unit. The physical condition helps establish depreciation. Also considered are factors such as views or proximity to a commercial area.

How will home improvements in progress be handled?

Initially the inspector will conduct a partial assessment, then return for a final assessment when the job is completed.

Note: Any permit for improvements made after inspection will be submitted to appraisers for future assessment. ▲

Double V (Victory Abroad and Victory at Home)
April 11, 7 p.m.

In a world premier at South Orange Performing Arts Center, this Broadway-style musical interweaves the lives of an African-American family and a European Jewish family over 20 turbulent years.

Playwright Jonathan Luks begins the story in 1939, comparing the lifestyles of the Hollis family, who face life-threatening prejudice in America's rural south, and the Ledermans who struggle to survive in the ghetto of Lodz, Poland. Their lives intersect as Trevor Hollis' elite Negro battalion liberates the Buchenwald concentration camp. Years later a debt of gratitude is repaid when the families meet again during the American Civil Rights Movement in 1964.

The set is painted by former Disney artist Ellen Valentino, and is inspired by the paintings of an Auschwitz survivor. The music and dance incorporate jazz and klezmer with jitterbug and hora.

The show is recommended for anyone age eight or older. Tickets are $6 for children and $12 for adults.

Scott Kalick remembers when he and fellow EMTs transported a man with severe chest pains. "Just as we got him onto the hospital stretcher, right there he coded" (a massive heart attack). Hospital staff took over and defibrillated and "by the time we were walking out, the man was talking. We knew by getting him there quickly, we gave him the best chance he had."

Kalick is one of about 40 active volunteers who man the South Orange Rescue Squad. As the current captain, he says, "It takes a special breed of people.

"Sometimes I get asked, 'How could you take that gore?' But people get into it because at one time they didn't know what to do. By learning the skills, you can help when everyone else is feeling helpless."

Last year, members of the South Orange Rescue Squad put in 15,000 hours and helped about 1,000 people. Each volunteer must agree to at least one shift per week, 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. They also provide "mutual aid" in surrounding communities, particularly Maplewood and West Orange.

New volunteers must become certified in cardio-pulmonary resuscitation, a five-hour training course, and they have one year to become emergency medical technicians, a 120-hour training course.

Continuing education is required to maintain the certifications.

Rescue work can quickly become a passion, says Sherry Weintraub, a 17-year volunteer and current squad president. "I've been on for 17 years." But veteran Mary Connor has her beaten with 38 years of service. Neither of them rides any more but there's plenty of work for the squad's 10-or-so nonriding volunteers, tasks such as fundraising, office management and recruiting.

Back when "we had a lot of females riding during the day," squad coverage used to be 24/7. But now, says Weintraub, "moms are working and not at home." In fact, all squad members have day-time jobs. With too few riders for round-the-clock coverage, South Orange contracted several years ago with MONOC, a nonprofit hospital cooperative that handles day-time hours, 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday through Thursday.

"We are striving to take back some of the weekdays," said

Weintraub, and in January, 24-hour Friday service resumed.

For now, nights (6 p.m. to 6 a.m.) belong to the local squad, and two to four volunteers sleep at the Third Street station every night.

"We became an in-house squad two years ago because our response times were too long," said Kalick. The change has cut the average response from 10 minutes to 3 or 4. "Now, we're actually beating the police to calls."

The squad's volunteers are a cross-cut of society, all races, religions and professions. About one third are Seton Hall students, many of them pursuing medical careers. "These are kids who could be partying every night," said Weintraub, "but they're here volunteering their time."

Kalick said the students generally stay as long as they're at SHU while local residents average 5 to 10 years of service.

The squad is administered by a nine-member board of directors, six of whom are active riders. They maintain two ambulances and an emergency response unit.

"You miss holidays and family functions because of the commitment you make and you don't get paid," said Weintraub, "but it's well worth it." ▲
